

A Log Cabin Square

1. Professor Wendell Arneson taught painting for 37 years and told his students to work quickly, to “save all the scraps,” to walk twenty feet back from an easel, “have a quick look, a blink, then keep going.” Wendell made everyone paint with knives and putty scrapers and iridescent paper and showed us how to find the color a canvas was missing in the accidental edges of our palettes. When he danced in the studio in Minnesota, he kept the exhaust fans on and his eyes closed and lifted two peace signs, alternately. He wore red or black. He’d gather everyone in the middle of a classroom and start whispering. Then he’d pin down a scrap of canvas with one hand and start swiping at it with a wet brush in the other. “Go fast,” he’d urge, “try overlapping this with that. If the composition seems unbalanced, cut it in half. Then you have two. Then try this.” And his students would huddle in, craning our necks over shoulders, glancing side-eye. “Yada yada yada,” he’d trail off from his own directions. Then he’d make a wide “O” with his mouth, hook a finger behind his cheek and pluck it, like a starting gun. Wendell began every single class with a “shelter” assignment. “Make a painting,” he said, “then build a shelter somewhere inside it.” So for him I painted cocoons, printed shells, and carved shacks into my drawings. I left clues. I saved a place to live inside every composition.

2. In Iowa, my friend Lonnie and I camped in the yard at the edge of the woods behind my mom's condo, where black turkey chicks hatched on land that was once my great-grandmother's farm before she sold it to the city. We pitched a tent and pasted the ceiling with heart throbs, men whose pecs and clims I recognized but whose names I never knew. I drew four-pane windows and pasted those to the gabbardine walls. Night fell and we kept a flashlight on, talked ourselves to sleep. Then we heard a child scream from the woods. The scream ascended right to its highest note and stuck before getting choked. We stopped breathing and my heart socked my ribs as the teatipper bounced at the fly.

My grandfather's friends used to chide him, "Some girls have a mink in their closet, but Rodge's wife has one in her fridge!" He met my grandmother at the UofT, and sold his books to buy her ring. They were hardback law books he'd bought with trapping money from catching mink and fox during the summer on her mother's land out past the city.

"It's a rabbit," I whispered to Lonnie in the tent, "Rabbits scream like a human when they're caught." Lonnie stared at me with big eyes, and said, after a minute, "What caught it?" Then we crawled, single file, from the tent to the house.

5. In Illinois I had a friend who called her mother “Mom,” even when she was talking to friends who used “my mom” to differentiate. “On Friday,” my friend would say, “Mom made us wash the dog,” or, “You really did convince Mom that you were vomiting at my house on Saturday because you accidentally ate meat and not because we were wasted.”

And because my friend had a twin sister who also said “Mom” without the “my,” I wondered if it was a kind of twin-talk. Otherwise the habit seemed insisting and precious, as if their mother was of a more familiar brand, or a higher order, until I learned that “Mom” was not this friend’s mother after all. “Mom” was the woman the twins’ father had married the year after their birth mother was shot by deer hunters while she was standing on their back deck. The hunters got off without charges. Afterwards, “Mom” did function more like a surname, a more precious word because it recalled the absence and its surrogate. The kind of reverence I hear inside “home” in Appalachia. Like the way god-fearing folks sometimes say “scripture.” Each incantation has a practiced dignity, but also some type of hole.

9. In college, I learned quickly that Wendell loved a series. In the studio he made wall-sized oil paintings, always in threes, built of layered, abstract textures. Most were dotted with ladders and fences tipped one way or the next ("Ways to get out or stay in!"). He taught me that paintings displayed in sequence can be linked with visual rhythms, repeating images that the audience will register unconsciously.

“See this pentagon here?” He asked with his finger in the wet paint, “You keep making it the same way. But if you hide it somewhere in each painting, change the scale and your materials, then the viewer will know the canvases are linked even if they don’t really know. They’ll know something, at least, about a home.

8. In Tucson where I last lived, it was dangerous to drive west at 6 in the evening because the angle of the sun made it hard to see through the windshield and impossible to read traffic lights. If you sat still at 2 in the afternoon, everything the sun touched went hollow. My skin didn't burn there, but it got harder, and tougher. It retained a kind of temperature like the hot blue of the desert sky.

Sometimes, at night, police helicopters would dip low over the adobe houses and shine spotlights across the windows, chasing (they'd say later), after someone running the neighborhood on foot. Their lights would turn the bedroom walls and the backboard silver, like sun in an old photograph, and then just as suddenly leave everyone awake in the dark, looking out at each other through windows.

4. "In 2005, during an exhibition called "Quilt Voices," Ellen Doughty explained, "When words fail me, I make a quilt... My quilts, therefore, start with something I have to say."

3. I see the popularity of the log cabin pattern probably relates to the pioneering myths of western expansion. Not always, but most often, the central square is red, which by tradition has become identified with the glowing hearth. "Significantly, the Log Cabin quilt's core motif popular during [that period], when women would want to transport pieces of their lives from one location to the other."

Mara Witzling, "Quilt Language: towards a poetics of quilting"

In a Log Cabin quilt pattern, the diminishing lengths of patches produce the optical illusion that half of the sections recede in space, or overlap on the shoulders of others, the way my father taught me to lay branches for a campfire. We alternated 1-inch sticks and wore these with brittle twigs, filled in the open center with brush. The same way Lincoln Logs, stacked correctly, protect a cooking fire no prairie wind can spread. In this way, Log Cabin quilts describe how home is a focal point; home is a flame surrounded. The "charred house," or Log Cabin, is a structure that dates back to the bronze age. It's a design that lasted not because it was permanent, but because it was easy for people on the move to disassemble and carry with them. The most common version of the Log Cabin quilt design is known as "Barn Raising Pattern," which includes a variation called "Pinwheel," a name that reminds me how Log Cabins of all types always suggests a clockwise turn, a cycle of rebuilding.

10. Q: Home City?

A: Twice, on my birthday, in the two years since my grandmother died, my father and stepmother have sent items of her clothing they once gathered from her house. In some sense I know this is a message about regret or bitterness for my never being around, and in another I know that they are trying to pass on a burden, to find relief from her materials and deliver a material relief.

13. My grandfather worked at a racetrack in Virginia as a kid and held the reins of the horses having their winning photographs. He told us once about the time the barn burned, when they had to tie mad horses to the fence. The ones they couldn't catch kept running back to their stalls panic. Horses on fire at full speed, circling back to their bright home.

17. Q: Home City?

A: Once, in Arizona, as I turned down the side of a football between a sharp drop and a thin shoulder, the body of a horse, notched through with sun, rounded the inner shoulder, and I had to look down and through the body to follow the highway as it curved.

one that people won't return to if they leave.
cloudier look that means Iowa is a real type of origin, and quality they couldn't place at first, followed by a second, whiteness to the eyes that says they've identified some folks when they first learn where I'm from. First a been an adjustment, like the expression on the faces of betrayal not to live in Iowa or expect to ever again. It's have been destroyed or sold to other families. A kind of It feels awkward now that all the homes I have lived in and sister and I were all born in the same hospital wing.
11. My great-grandmother, my grandmother, my mother

7. "There is, contained in the paradoxical meanings of cloth in our culture, a manifestation of the deepest, most primitive mammalian drive to make a place, to protect and house, to meet the needs of the first human relation that connects mothers and their infants. There is something about the cultural classification of textiles that is 'homey' in the American sense of the word—not beautiful or un-militated, unheimlich: the uncanny. There is anxiety concealed something far more interesting which derives from the European sense of the home as one-half the uncanny, the uncanny, the troubling anxiety of familiarity and otherness which generates the heightened ambivalence our culture has about cloth and clothes." —Claire Pajaczkowska, "On Stuff and Nonsense: The Complexity of Cloth"

is a flame surrounded was easy for people o
a variation called it was permanent, but because it was a "Raising Pattern," which included

Log Cabin quilts described a design that lasted not because it design is known as "Bar the wind can spread. In this way, the version of the Log Cabin qu abin, is a structure that dates back to the 19th century. It was used to protect a cooking fire no pra

Lincoln Logs, stacked correctly. The "chattel house," or Log move to disassemble and carry "Pinwheel," a name that rem-